HOW LONG DO I KEEP IT?

Record Keeping Tips

- * Keep Only What You Need
- * Keep Documents As Long As You Need Them To Support Tax Deductions
- * If You Can Get A Copy Later There's No Need To Keep It
- * Cross-Cut Shred Documents With Personal Info
- * Most Documents Can Be Safely Disposed Of After 7 Years

A question commonly asked by people involves how long they should keep certain types of records. There really is no specific answer that would apply in all cases or to all types of records. One factor to consider is whether you would be able to obtain additional copies of the records at a later time (like from the bank or credit company) if you should need them. You should also consider in what circumstances you may need these records, and the consequences of not having the records if you decide to dispose of them. You might want to consider scanning your records and saving them digitally (like on a CD Rom) before getting rid of them. The digital copy of your records could then be placed in your safe or safe deposit box and be available to you for future needs.

If you decide that it is safe to dispose of your personal financial records, it is critical that you do so in a safe and responsible manner. Cross-cut shredding or burning are the safest ways to dispose of these sensitive records without exposing yourself to the possibility of identity theft.

Consumer Reports® recommends that you dispose of bank deposit slips after you've reconciled your statements. Bank account statements can usually be destroyed after a calendar year, unless they are needed to support a tax deduction, in which case retain them with your tax records for 7 years. Receipts are much the same, keeping them until the warranty expires or if needed to support tax deductions, 7 years. Credit card bills can also be disposed of after you've checked them, or after 7 years if needed to support tax deductions.

Americans receive hundreds of financial documents a year, but do not know when it's safe to destroy them.

When and how to dispose of important financial documents can be so intimidating that we refuse to think about it; keeping documents for years beyond what is necessary. The bottom line is that there is a limit, but that depends greatly on the types of documents and your need for them.

FREE LIVING WILL

The area of Estate Planning is confusing, and nothing leads more to confusion than the title given to the legal documents used for planning. Often times, a Will (or Last Will and Testament) is confused for a Living Will. A Living Will can be a critical end-of-life document to have. How many remember the saga of Terri Schiavo?

We know Terri Schiavo because she did not have a Living Will; leading to years of legal battles and nearly $1 million in legal fees. As a courtesy to our clients, we have placed a downloadable Living Will form on our website, so that anyone can have one.

If you need to discuss your Estate Plan, call our office for an appointment. We will be happy to sit with you to evaluate your needs and create a plan especially designed for your situation.

$4.1 MILLION FOR WRONGFUL DEATH

Attorney KEITH R. TAYLOR has obtained what is believed to be one of the largest wrongful death verdicts in Citrus County history. In this uninsured motorist action against our client's own insurance company, Mr. Taylor showed the jury how our client's loss was significant, and how a large dollar verdict was necessary to bring justice in this matter. The verdict included medical and funeral expenses of just over $13,000. By use of an expert economist, Mr. Taylor showed the jury that the economic loss to our client by the death of her 72 year old husband exceeded $550,000.

In this case, our client's husband was riding his motorcycle when a reckless driver made a left turn across his path, causing the crash and his death. The reckless driver did not have enough insurance to pay for the losses suffered by our client, so a claim was instituted against her insurance company under the terms of her uninsured motorist coverage. "The insurance company refused to pay, so we took them to trial," said Taylor.

Having handled many cases involving wrongful death, Mr. Taylor understands that the sudden and traumatic nature of this kind of death is different than natural death, and the survivors suffer differently. Understanding the importance of explaining the emotional and psychological pain suffered because of the loss of a spouse, Mr. Taylor was able to help the jury find that the value of the emotional loss to our client was $3.5 million.

This verdict followed a $3.2 million verdict obtained by the firm just 2 months earlier.

FIRM SUPPORTS CHILDRENS EVENT

The firm is proud to continue its support of the Annual Rotary Club Children's Christmas Shopping Program. For over 20 years, the Rotary Club of Crystal River has provided a Christmas for needy and deserving children in Citrus County. Attorney Keith Taylor has served as Event Spokesman and coordinator for several years, helping coordinate and direct the many volunteers from the Citrus County Rotary Clubs and high school Interact Clubs during the event. Mr. Taylor often includes his own children in the activity of assisting the less fortunate children with their shopping and wrapping of gifts for their own families.

BROKEN EGGS

Our firm handles a significant number of cases involving car crashes. Many times our clients have suffered significant injuries, but their car shows very little damage. In these cases, it is usually not disputed that the client has an injury (as the doctors say they do), but the insurance companies try to say that "something else" must have caused the injury or that it existed prior to the crash. In doing so, the insurance companies point to pictures of the car (showing little or no damage) or the repair estimate, showing relatively minor repairs. Then they ask jurors to conclude, using their "common sense," that this little "tap" could not have caused injuries to our client. This is an effort to mislead and confuse.

Most of us have seen photographs of vehicles which were destroyed, and no one was hurt; just as we've seen little damage to the car, but significant injury (sometimes even death) to the occupant. The insurance companies play to "use your common sense," is nothing but a trick. In fact, common sense would support a causal link between a crash and injuries, when the client was not having any problems or symptoms of injury prior to the crash, and immediately following the crash, they began to experience pain. No doctor has ever diagnosed injury (or lack of injury) by looking at photographs of a car or a damage repair estimate.

It's kind of like buying eggs at the grocery store. Every person I've ever talked to opens up the egg carton to examine the eggs themselves. Even though the carton (think car) shows absolutely no damage, we all still look at the eggs (think patient / occupant of car). Many times we find damaged eggs. While people are not eggs, we are complex and sensitive beings, and our bodies cannot take forces like steel and other car parts can. While many, or even most, people do not suffer significant injuries in minor crashes, a great number of people do every year.

Think about it: Is it "common sense" to tell a person who just got struck by lightning that he or she could not have been struck, because the odds of getting struck by lightning are 1 in 750,000? In this context, you can see the ridiculousness of their position. Our firm recognizes the arguments being made by insurance companies in an attempt to deny legitimate claims, and we are prepared to help jurors to not be misled by this flawed approach.
